The work consisted of 32 pages, hand bound and sewn, and illustrated by woodcuts designed by Dora Carrington. As Anne Whitehead points out, Young has been able to show that "the gathering of fragments is central to the process of Holocaust memorialisation, particularly in Poland" According to Whitehead, Young recognizes a fascination with and even fetishisation of the remaining objects and indicates that Holocaust museums tend to display them as if "the debris of history" could serve as "an encounter with history itself" The problem is that the object's power or ability to signal beyond itself is gravely overestimated: For, by themselves, these remnants rise in a macabre dance of memorial ghosts.
